In this book, L'Abate shows how relational competence theory complements other theories that place an individual's personality and functioning into the complete context of the family. Prior to his death he was involved in full-time writing and research and lectured internationally, most recently in Tokyo, Japan in August 2013.

Luciano L'Abate - Wikipedia

If nursing is seen as a relational practice, competence is clearly person/context-dependent and is determined by what relationally transpires in particular health care situations. 4 In this view, reimagining relational practice requires that we both look beyond an individualist view of patients/families and reconsider our understanding of competent nursing practice. We are called to move out of relational oblivion and heighten our response-ability, becoming practitioners who continually ...
