Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong by Morten Jerven

With Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong, Morten Jerven offers a bracing corrective. Neither story, he shows, is accurate. In truth, most African economies have been growing rapidly since the 1990s—and, until a collapse in the '70s and '80s, they had been growing reliably for decades.

Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong, Jerven

Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong. Not so long ago, Africa was being described as the “~Hopeless Continent’. Recently, though, talk has turned to “~Africa Rising’, with enthusiastic voices exclaiming the potential for economic growth across many of its countries. What, then, is the truth behind Africa’s growth, or lack of it?

Development economics as a field of study was formally launched in the 1950s by the Afro-Caribbean economist Arthur Lewis who, out of necessity, wanted to understand how his own country, Saint Lucia, could transform from an agro-based economy into a modern industrial state (later, in 1979, Lewis was awarded the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economics for this work, the only black person to have won the prize to date). For Lewis, the key to providing a satisfactory answer to the problem of ...

June 8, 2015 by ChristopherEjugbo. I recently went to a book launch for a book titled “Africa: Why Economist Get it Wrong” by Morten Jerven. The biggest premise of the book according to the author is that most of the economic data about Africa are , in my own words frankly speaking made up. He contrasted the headline in the Economist in 2000 describing Africa as The Hopeless Continent with another headline a decade later in the same magazine enthusiastically talking about Africa Rising.

Africa is developing a modest middle class due to the high prices paid for their commodities until recently by China, India and other fast-growing countries. This middle class of about 20 million persons has more than $20 dollars a day to spend. This is attracting big retail like Walmart and Shoprite.

Misunderstanding Growth in Africa: how economists get it ...

Whilst for the past two decades experts have focused on explaining why there has been a 'chronic failure of growth' in Africa, Jerven shows that most African economies have been growing at a rapid pace since the mid nineties. In addition, African economies grew rapidly in the fifties, the sixties, and even into the seventies.
