McKibben's 2006 book, "Beyond Cannery Row," investigated the role Sicilian women played in creating community, identity and economy in Monterey from 1915 to 1999. While Sicilian men toiled on the water, women not only took care of the households but worked in canneries, managed the books, and diversified their families' businesses beyond the docks and into real estate and other entrepreneurial pursuits.

The Sicilian women of Cannery Row were exceptional in many ways. The sense of pride in the community led them to hold on to their traditions strongly and keep the family together at any cost. I am technically a fifth generation Sicilian, but my great aunt Pansy still reflects the companionismo, or village loyalty, sentiment of that time.
