Then, I'd recommend "Improvise: Scene From The Inside Out" as a necessary followup, and then Keith Johnstone's "Impro" as a whole new viewpoint and also a deeper insight into the philosophy of being in the moment. (By the way, I would avoid the Viola Spolin book - it's written in a strangely stilted, boring, hard-to-read style, and really ...

Napier's wrote his handbook guide for students of improvisation, Improvise:Scene from the Inside Out in 2002. In it, he challenges 'The Rules' of improv that many students first learn. Napier argues that these 'Rules' are not only not helpful, but actually destructive to the process of creating good improv.

The improvised line was actually an inside joke between the cast and the crew, who encountered a few bumps due to a budget shorter than needed. One of the bumps was the camera crew's support boat, which was too small to handle its job. Everyone kept telling the producers they were going to need a bigger boat, which became a catchphrase for ...
